CHAPTER ONE

Beginnings

Every story has a beginning. These are the earliest memories and moments that shaped everything that followed.

Where does your story begin, and what have you been told about that day?

My story began on a cold October morning in a small local hospital. I was told I arrived a little earlier than expected and caused quite a bit of panic, but once everything settled, my mum said the room felt peaceful. My dad always joked that i made an entrance from the very start.

Is there a story behind your name, and what does it mean to you now?

My name was chosen because my mother thought it sounded gentle and timeless. When I was younger it was simply my name, but now it feels tied to family, warmth, and the people who first loved me.

What kind of world were you born into?

I was born into a world that felt much slower than today. People had less, but they seemed to make more of what they did have. Neighbours knew one another, children played outside for hours, and family life felt like the centre of everything.

Who were the people surrounding you in your earliest years?

My earliest years were filled with family. My parents were at the centre of everything, and my grandparents were a big part of everyday life too. There were also family friends who seemed to appear at birthdays, Sunday dinners, and all the little important moments in between.

What did “home” feel like growing up?

Home felt warm, busy, and safe. It smelled of cooking, washing drying near the fire, and sometimes something sweet baking in the oven. It was not grand or perfect, but it was full of love and the kind of familiarity that makes a person feel secure.
